This project examines the works and words of virtual world inhabitants who are producing television analogues that both reify and trouble the products and practices of traditional television. Their works and words present the promises and perils of our Web 2.0 world, of the tensions between individualism and collectivism, between media producer and media user, and between experimentation and familiarity.